Food bloggers making more than tempting photos at benefit bake sale

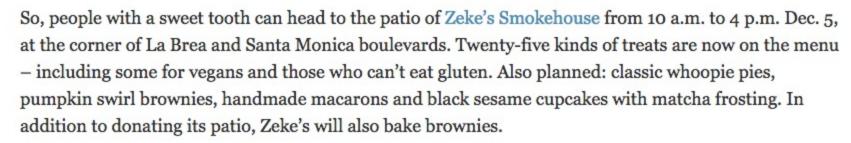

NOVEMBER 4, 2009 | 1:03 PM

Cathy Danh got it just right when she described the problem with food blogs.

"I look at food blogs, pretty much every day, and lots of them, and I'm always thinking, 'I want to eat that,' " said Danh, who writes at Gastronomy Blog.

So, she and Laurie Moore of the blog G-ma's Bakery decided to make at least some of those alluring photos real and available to all comers. They have organized Eat My Blog, a monster bake sale to benefit the L.A. Regional Food Bank.

"It seeemed silly to have people make all that food and eat it without a cause," Danh said this morning.

Danh plans to bake rosemary apricot bars.

Among the blogs taking part are Eat. Sip. Chew., Eating L.A. and Delicious Coma.

Baked goods will sell for $1, $2 or $3. If other bakers want to take part, they can contact Danh at cathy37@gmail.com.

"It's a way to connect with our readers in an intimate and real way," said Diana Hossfeld, author of the blog Diana Takes a Bite and a member of the Eat My Blog organizing committee.

The Los Angeles Regional Food Bank gets food to nearly 900 sites in L.A. County.
